[Copyright, 1895, by John Clark Ridpath.] VIII.—EMERGENCE.

For Napoleon, Toulon was the open gate to greatness. His "destiny," for which he sought so diligently, came to him unawares among the guns of his battery there. Those guns were trained first on Fort L'Equillette, and then on the British ships of Admiral Hood. Our ships, including the good ship Orient, in which, after four years and seven months, we shall embark for Egypt, are pent up in a nook of the harbor. Over the town, through October and November, floats the banner of St. George. The Lily flag of the Bourtons has given place not to the new Bourbons has given place, not to the new Tricolor of the Revolution, but to the forrallied the Royalists of Toulon. It is to be noted that the first and the last of Napoleon's guns are directed against the flag of England. From Toulon to Waterloot There lies the space of twenty-one years and six months—filled with the wreck and transformation of the world!

Here, on the beautiful Mediterrapean shore, the great act begins. A division of the French National army has been sent to retake the traitorous town. The commanders are General Doppet, who from being a doctor has taken to this fighting form of patriotism, and General Dugommier, an officer who, fourteen years ago, was with Lafayette in our American army of Independence. Others of military ex-perience hold subordinate commands; and here also are several representatives from the National Convention.

The latter, under orders of that body, are darting hither and you like arrows, to sting whoever shall be unfaithful to the Revolution. Some fly to the field of Valmy, where, in the wood of Argonne, they rt about with eyes sharper than swords Others are on the track of Dumouriez, toward Belgium and the Netherlands, where he struggles to drive back the Germans; and does it. Others are with Custine's army, and still others here at Toulon, watching everything, and making fatal report of any blunder. Hither have come Barras himself, and Freron, and Salicetti, the Corsican representative in the assembly, and in particular Augustin Rebesplerre, called the Younger, destined in the day of doom to leap ingloriously from the window of the Convention hall, into a horrid cesspool in the alley!

Among these moves the taciturn Capsain Bonaparte. On the 19th of October he is promoted to be major and chef-de-

NAPOLEON BY DELARGCHE. [Engraved by Audoin after a design by Bouil

Bataillen. He is placed at the head of the artillery-his own place, as events will show. Tradition has it that he eats little; sleeps among his gun-carriages; laughs not at all (except once, when a young man by his side dodging from a shell is cut in two by it!); is sun-tanned to a bronze. He with the rest sees that Toulon is not taken; but unlike the rest he studies the map, and going from place to place, uses his spy-glass. He looks many times at Fort L'Eguillette, where the British flag is flying. Toulon is indeed strong. Admiral Hood says that he will beat back this French army and make the place still stronger. He will make it a second Gibraltar—if the unforeseen do not prevent him.

But the unforeseen prevents. For more than two months the siege pounds itself away in vain. Then there is a council of war. The older officers, thoroughly imbued with military "science," suggest this method and that method of taking the town. The National representatives look on. Toulon must be taken; and the Convention has sent an impossible plan of doing it. It comes Napoleon's time to speak. "Yonder," says he, "is Fort L'Eguillette. Take that; it is the key to all. Here into that ravine is a line of approach—to a certain point. Let us send thither a storming column, under protection of my guns. I will pound the fort with shells, till the point is reached. Then there shall be a pause. Out of the tollow shall spring my column. One bound, like the leap of a cat-o'-mountain, and the fort is ours. will turn the guns on the town, and on Hood's ships. Everything shall be inside out in an hour!"

Here, then, is audacity. Dugommier and Doppet and the rest purse up their mouths and look wise. This is dangerous; but Major Bonaparte may try it! So on the 19th of December, 1793, he tried it; and the thing was done. Fort L'Eguillette was bombarded, and carried by storm. The Royalists fied to the British ships, and Hood took wing by sea. Toulon was not made into 'another English Gibral-tar.' The Revolution has Toulon, and will keep it forever. The National repre-sentatives see who it is that has done this. Only three days afterwards Napoleon is nominated general of Brigade. He is now twenty four years four months old. His appointment is approved—after a little delay; and on the 16th of February, 1794, on that body and on the public was as yet only transient. At this epoch, when all quarters of France were shaken with commotions and local revolutions, the brilliant capture of a single fort and town on the Mediterranean was not enough to cregte a permanent military fame. The Conis as expty as vention contented itself with making General Bonaparte "Inspector" of the coast-country, between the Rhone and the Var. His duty was to maintain order in that region, and to complete the Revolution. The was acquainted with some who had been appointment was made on the 26th of Dewas encouraged to believe that if she could but touch the hem of His garment she cember, only a few days after the fall of Toulon. The duty imposed made it neces-sary for him to traverse the district extending from Marscilles to Cannes-a maritime region which had been mortally ing and hearing by the word of God (Rom x, 17), so if we would strengthen others infected with royalism. and increase their faith we must communicate that which God has done for us

By the close of the year, however, the old spirit was virtually extinguished in Southeastern France; and Napoleon found little to satisfy his restless spirit. His tours of Inspection and duties connected therewith occupied his time until Febru-ary of 1794, when he was recalled to Paris. That city was now a seething cauldren. The Reign of Terror was at its aemo. That period, unparalleled in human an-nals, extended from March of 1793, when the Revolutionary tribunal was organized, to July 28th of the following year, when Robespierro and his colleagues were sent to the guillotine. Strange that in the midst of all the horror rising on horrors accumulated in the French capital there was still an outstretched arm of strength bearing a sword of sharpness for foreign nations! The military organization was completed as follows:

The Army of the North was created and The Army of the North was creeted and put under command of Generals Jourdan, Leclerc, Vandamme, Brune, and Mortier. The Army of the Rhine was commanded by Generals Pichegru, Scherer and Berthier. The Army of the West was organized with Marceau and Eleber as commanders. The Army of Italy was commanded by Duerbion and Massena; and to this General Bonaparte was assigned as chief of the artillery and assistant in the preparation of plans for the campaign. He was thus occupied in Paris at the time when it became the saying, La guillotine va toniours -the guillotine goes always!

It was the duty of the Army of Italy to occupy that country as a vantage ground against the coalitions that were forming beyond the Rhine. The Italian towns and States were wavering according to race prejudice and interest between affiliation with the French Republic and the "protection" of Germany. By the sick-ness of Dumerbion, General Massena came to the chief command of this division of the French National forces. A campaign was undertaken in July of 1794, but the general of artillery did not, for the present, leave Paris. He was soon despatched, however, as an agent under or ders of the Convention, to Genoa. He was to protest to the Genoese authorities against the permission which seemed to be extended to the coalition to occupy the neutral territory. It was a delicate business; for the other officers did not understand the true nature of the instructions and the delegates Salicetti and Albitte were themselves ignorant of what was

The result was that Bonaparte was first misunderstood and then distrusted in his negotiations with the Genoese govern-ment. He was openly directed to protest against the occupation of the territory of Genoa by the enemies of France; but secrefly he was authorized to examine the fortresses of the city and make notes or the general topography of that region. While engaged in this work, he was suddenly suspended from office, put under arrest, and declared to be suspected! For hung above him by a single thread.

Just at this juncture, however, ere Napoleon could be hauled before the Revolutionary tribunal, that body itself was blown into death-blackness by a counter revolution. Robespierre and his bloody clique were seized, after a day or two of horrid broil in the city, and were sent maimed, dazed, jaw-broken, bone-broken, headlong to the guillotine. In that case, the other saying of the hour, namely, "the guillotine goes not badly," was graciously

The destruction of the tribunal had The destruction of the tribunal had a paradoxical effect on the interest of Napoleon. It was from that body that his secret instructions had emanated. Therefore his friends were dead; also, his witnesses. But their plunge into oblivion left behind a lurid trail that scorched him. It was now said that Augustin Robespierr had been too much the friend of Genera Bonaparte! Like Casar in the matter of his intrigue with Catiline, the hero of Toulon was seriously compromised with the members of the Terror. Left to his own resources, however, he wrote a powerful and audacious protest to the Representatives Albitte and Salicetti; convinced them of his innocence; won them over to his cause; obtained from them a report of exculpation; and after thirteen days of mortal peril was set at liberty! On his return to Paris, in August of 1794, his defense was accepted by the ministry of war, and he was offered the command of a brigade of infantry in the Army of the West, with orders to operate against the Royalists of La Vendee. He refused to Royalists of La Vendee. He refused to accept either the field of operations or the infantry arm of service; and for this the Committee of Public Safety—intolerant of all refusels—struck his name from the list of general officers, and he was once more turned adrift in Paris.
